Two California trainees with ties to Donald Trump filed a lawsuit against The Washington Post for the right to be identified as "Students 5" of its opinion section. "I think it's a novel way to publicize a newspaper's opinion section," says DePaul University professor and Columbia Law School professor Jeffrey Rosen, who specializes in First Amendment law. "But I think the suit is a little bit chutzpah-y, too." Under the Post's affiliate rules, it would be difficult for a reporter or editor to officially recognize students 5. And besides, Rosen notes, the Post already has provided context when it published a detailed opinion piece explaining the lawsuit. "I think the Post has done a good job of giving the trainees the benefit of the doubt," he says. "I don't think they're trying to hide their identities, but you have to be careful with
